WHAT THE WORLD NEEDS NOW: What theater knows about creative collaboration can help 21st century work, play & life

Sherry Kafka Wagner

There is widespread agreement that success in the increasingly connected, technology driven world of this century requires creativity, both individual creativity and collaborative creativity. While as a culture we are fairly well-versed in individual creativity, we are woefully lacking in knowledge and understanding of collaborative creativity. Yet this is what is being required of us for success in the changing landscape we inhabit. The one Western institution that has depended on collaborative creativity for 2000 years is the theater. How can this knowledge, skill, and expertise be brought to bear on the development of new ways to function in the world we now inhabit?

THE POWER OF VOICE

Will Richey and Alejandro Perez, Jr. of Journeyman Ink

It will be facilitated through the Melody Memory Method – a low risk / high success, “See it. Say it. Do it.” approach that will energize and invigorate the group with its kinesthetic, call and response mantras and affirmations. Participants will receive the invitation to write and share their very own words.
